Career readiness should compound

Students build career assets throughout their education, but those assets are often not organized until graduation approaches. A connected readiness model treats coursework, projects, credentials, internships, apprenticeships and employment as parts of the same professional progression.

Readiness model

| Stage | What the student builds |
|---|---|
| Discover | Career direction and role awareness |
| Profile | Education, projects, skills and interests |
| Prepare | Resume, communication, interviewing and professionalism |
| Experience | Internships, apprenticeships, projects and relevant work |
| Match | Connections to employer and program opportunities |
| Interview | Evidence-based stories and professional confidence |
| Place | Employment and next-stage development |

Every semester can add a career asset

- A class project can become a work sample.
- A campus role can become evidence of responsibility and communication.
- An internship can become a reference and employer relationship.
- A certification can close a readiness gap for a target role.
- An apprenticeship can combine skill development with employment progression.

Institutional value

Universities benefit when student career development is visible before graduation. Employers benefit when candidates arrive with more context, stronger professional assets and relevant experience. Students benefit when the transition to work is planned rather than compressed into the final semester.
