QADIR EL-AMIN is a lifelong member of the Muslim Community Cultural Center of Baltimore (MCCCB). The son of Imam Earl El-Amin and Sister Donna El-Amin, Qadir was raised in the MCCCB community and has remained an active, familiar face at the Cultural Center throughout his life.

Born and raised in Baltimore City, Qadir attended Paul Laurence Dunbar High School before continuing his education at Lincoln University in Oxford, Pennsylvania, where he earned a bachelor's degree in Digital Mass Communications in 2018. Qadir brings professional experience in administrative support, financial services operations, communications, and community engagement. At T. Rowe Price, he gained experience in data entry, account maintenance, reporting, discrepancy resolution, and supporting team operations in a fast-paced professional environment.

His communications background has also been applied directly to community-focused work. As a Community Engagement Specialist with The Movement Team, Qadir utilized storytelling, outreach, and digital communications to engage diverse audiences. His responsibilities included managing media and social platforms and developing culturally relevant educational materials designed to connect with and inform the communities being served.

Qadir currently works as a longshoreman at the Port of Baltimore, adding another dimension to a professional background that reflects adaptability, teamwork, attention to detail, and the ability to work effectively in demanding environments.

After decades of involvement with MCCCB as a community member, Qadir expanded his service by joining the MCCCB Board of Directors in 2021. He brings to the Board not only his professional experience in communications, administration, and community engagement, but also a lifelong connection to MCCCB and an understanding of the community, its history, and the people it serves.
